

RESULTS FROM JUNE 15, 2011

When we arrived this morning a little before 7:00, a brief drenching rain blew in out of nowhere – soaking us thoroughly before we got the shelters set up to wait it out. So, we got off to a slightly later start than usual.

Feature 119 continues to yield an interesting assemblage of artifacts – including this siltstone abrader. The groove across the middle is from sharpening objects – probably in this case, some kind of groundstone woodworking tools (axes, adzes, chisels).

Although a bit damp, the cooler weather was pleasant for a couple of hours – then additional rain threatened around 10:15. While we can work in a light rain shower, this time the rain was accompanied by lightning. Our day was cut short once again.
